Welcome to a whole new type of activism!

If you are tired of making little or no progress on large-scale systemic common good problems like climate change, corruption, discrimination, or economic inequality, and you think it's possible to take an analytical approach instead of the grassroots activism approach that currently prevails, then this is the group for you.

Analytical Activism is the use of analysis instead of intuition and trial and error to solve difficult activist problems, whether they be environmental, economic, social, or political. The core strategy is to take an engineering approach and apply business tools to social problems, using tools such as root cause analysis, social force diagrams, feedback loop modeling, and a problem solving process that fits the problem. While such tools may sound complex, they are not. An example of one of these tools is shown below.

We've got some challenging activist problems ahead of us, especially since the rise of authoritarian populists, not just in the United States but all around the world. However, this group is non-partisan. We are working to analytically improve the common good of all. Check your party or candidate ideology at the door.

Meetings will initially be led by Jack Harich, systems engineer at Thwink.org. Our two key documents are:

General Plan - Describes our project as a whole.

Training Plan - Describes how project members can learn the analytical tools.
